

These are also morphiis.
They portray Depression, Pain, Nausea, and Happiness.

They are designed to help people to share what they feel, and how intensely they feel it. They quantify the qualitative, in a new way that is clearer, language agnostic, and culture-fair.

With morphiis, unlike star ratings or numerical scales, people are never asked to try to quantify or estimate how they feel. They simply show it. Morphiis do the measurement for them, in the background.

Morphiis are designed to make the critical tasks of care - diagnosis, treatment, after care, prevention, and satisfaction feedback - easier for everyone.

They can be implemented into screening questionnaires, feedback surveys, clinical assessments, research protocols, and even mobile applications.
